Description:

Born to affluence and opportunity in the South's Golden Age, Mary Motte Alston Pringle (1803-1884) represented the epitome of Southern white womanhood. Her husband, William, was a wealthy rice planter who owned four plantations and 337 slaves. Her thirteen children included two Harvard scholars, seven world travelers, three socialite daughters, a U.S. Navy war hero, six Confederate soldiers, one possible Union collaborator, a Confederate firebrand trapped in the North, an expatriate bon vivant in France, and two adventuresome California pioneers. Marys

World illuminates in lavish detail the world and psyche of this wealthy, well-educated, highly-principled nineteenth-century Southern planter's wife. This biography was drawn directly from over 2,500 pages of Mary's unpublished letters, journals and diaries, none of which, she could have imagined, would ever be read by strangers. Therein lies their power. In her own words, Mary tells us about the joys, sorrows, frustrations, and terrors she and her family faced before, during, and after the Civil War. We also learn about the vastly different lifestyles, food, clothing, and experiences of their 337 slaves. Mary's World also pays special attention to Lucretia Cretia Stewart, Mary's favorite servant, Cretia's husband, Scipio, and their free descendants, some of whom worked for Mary's grandchildren well into the twentieth century. Between 1861 and the Union occupation of Charleston in 1865, Mary and her husband, William, stood helpless as two sons were killed, another was driven insane, their slaves were freed, their entire social class was destroyed. Mary felt that God had forsaken her and the Confederacy. Unable to adapt to the realities of post-war life, she and William died forlorn relics of The Lost Cause. How they, their children, and slaves lived before the Civil War, clung desperately to life in the eye of the maelstrom, and coped or failed to cope -- with its bewildering aftermath is the story of this book. The letters and images they left behind offer priceless insights into the roots of Southern social history.

This is a fascinating book. One of the things that makes it so interesting is that the author describes in considerable detail the lives of Mary's 13 children, many of whom had very different experiences. I found that the most intriguing one was John Julius Pringle, named for his grandfather. Before the Civil War John Julius was living in Louisiana on a large cotton plantation that his wife had been given. The Union forces occupied this part of the state early in the War and John Julius made a lot of money selling cotton. If he served in the Confederate Army, his service was brief. Since all of the rest of the family were ardent supporters of the Confederacy, John Julius was something of a black sheep. However, once the War was over, John Julius dutifully provided his mother significant financial support so she did not lose her house, the famous Miles Brewton House (sometimes also known as the Pringle House) to taxes. In his later years John Julius was renowned snipe (the bird) hunter. The other part of the book that is rarely covered is the history of the family once the Civil War was over. It describes how the family tried to keep its plantations going and its relations with the workers who were now free. My mother's family were Pringles descended from one of Judge Robert Pringle's sons. Mary's husband was descended from his other son. When I would visit Charleston as a child in the 1940s and 50s, I was aware of the Pringle House and had wondered what its story was. Having an interest in Civil War, I also wanted to know more about Major Robert Pringle who was killed defending Fort Wagner. After reading Mary's World my curiosity was completely satisfied. I strongly recommend this book since you can see history as it unfolds in some specific individuals.
